

Tips on Special Education Advocacy During COVID-19

Please join our Special Education Advocates, Karen Lynch and Jennifer O'Neill for our October 21, 2020 Special Education workshop on Tips on Special Education Advocacy During COVID-19.

We are aware that students with disabilities and their respective families or caregivers are under immense stress as they attempt to navigate and address the impact of the extended school closures, remote learning and proposed hybrid learning models for the new school year.

Many parents and caregivers are uncertain and worried about what will happen with their children for the 2020/21 School Year. Whether education access is remote or in a hybrid (modified) model, as parents we know that our children with disabilities thrive on routine and do best in structured environments, both of which have been and will be disrupted during these times.

The Special Education Advocates at TRI are here to offer support and guidance on ways that will help parents/caregivers problem solve, implement ways to support remote learning; and how to work with your child's educational team to address concerns and develop recommendations to support learning remotely or in a hybrid school environment.
